Learning to navigate the social world takes practice. When infants and toddlers spend time in classrooms specially designed to meet their needs for belonging, exploration and discovery, and with teachers who understand and support those needs, the social world becomes easier to navigate.

In this workshop teachers will learn about early social and emotional development. They will gain understanding of strategies to support young children's ability to self-regulate and learn to calm. They will practice skills to support their capacity to 'approach calmly' so that the children in their classrooms can learn to do the same.
